Chapter 1 by Totally Olive

I knew a guy. He was the kindest most generous person you could ever met. He emitted more love than anyone I know. He loved everyone but he loved me like no one else, well maybe his family. He never knew that his love would someday kill him. We used to look at that stars together on walks.

"Someday I'll be with the stars" He would say

I never knew what he meant till he was gone. I hated not knowing what he was going through. I wanted to help no matter what the cost. Then he told me he had (Insert some cancer or disease). I cried asking if there was anything thing I could do, but there was nothing I could do. He said one day it will spread to the heart and after that there's no stopping it. He knew one day it would kill him.

He said he was fighting it. But the medication wasn't working, chemo was failing and nothing else was working. He said it didn't hurt him. That he said when it was time it wouldn't hurt him. I cried every night knowing that I alone couldn't stop it. I was dreading that phone call, dreading the day we wouldn't sit at lunch together, dreading that day when he is gone out of my life.

I loved him and I hated I was losing him. He was admitted to the hospital early this week. I went to see him everyday after school. I brought him flowers a teddy bear and a balloon with a card. I brought in all the cards that his friends were sending him.

"You know I'm not ever coming out of this hospital. But I said to him on day I nodded trying to keep the tears from flowing down my face. He said to me, "It's okay to cry hun"

He sat next to me on the window sill and I sobbed.

"It's not fair!" I cried into his chest.

"I know, life isn't fair" He stroked my hair holding me in his arms. I never wanted that moment to end.
